A TRIBUTE.

(Written on the death of a friend.)

O friend! thou hast but little need

Of the fond words of earth

And yet I cannot yet forbear

This humble tribute to thy worth.

All pure, unselfish hearts have power

Beyond the thought of mortal loss,

To witness to thy noble life.

The pulses of thy fellow-men

And though no more within our midst

We know that truth has stronger growth,

And a rich harvest yet shall spring

From precious seed thy hand hath sown.

Remembrance of thy goodness shall

A heritage to us remain;

And we rejoice that noble lives

Have never yet been lived in vain.

That no man lives unto himself,

Immortal souls have given to needs;

The sweetest memories of the heart,

Are those of kindly words and deeds.

ALL LET DOWN.

In another hour this week of excitement will have closed and been relegated to the receding past. Few of its personal reminders, its feelings, its joys and its disappointments, really found their way to the printed page. For the most part, all these things have been tucked away in the memories of the individual participants.

Many little rivulets of inspiration and numerous streams of aspirations, will silently flow out and on, till the end of the life of each, but the great volume of the happenings of the week will be remembered no more forever, however prolific of good the aggregated influences which may flow out and on. As we said, a few minutes more and the week with its first day of rest and reaction, will be ushered in. Like the sunday crew, who have manned their bargue all the storm and mangled the pumps since last Monday morning, now peaceful swinging in their hammocks, which are all

NEDERLANDER'S NEW OFFICE.

The old reliable real estate and insurance establishment, of N. F. Niederlander, is too well known in this city, and all over the country, for that matter, to need any further recommendation, but his new quarters are worthy of special mention. For years he occupied the old and well known frame office on the corner of Douglas and Emporia avenue, but his rapidly growing trade, which demanded a large corps of clerks and assistants, made it imperative that he seek more commodious quarters. For this purpose he leased all the lower floor of Noble's handsome building, corner of Douglas and Topeka avenue, and when the building was thoroughly moved in, but not until now, has he fully furnished and fitted up his new quarters, therefore, a word at this time will not be out of place.

As before stated, he occupies the entire ground floor which is 25x30 feet. This is divided into a business and private office. The business office, which is in front, is 25x30 feet.

In front is an open space comprising one half of the room and which is fitted up for the accommodation of those who come there on business. Behind this, and separated by a handsome railing, is the business office, provided with costly and handsome desks. The walls of both these rooms are covered with maps and lithographs illustrative of his business, and the entire arrangement for the information of his customers. His corps of assistants are:

Lev Hamilton, first assistant and chief clerk; J. D. Huchings, assisted by A. C.

Niederlander, has charge of the city real-estate and advertising department; W. J. Martin and the other clerks manage the general land department; J. L. Meade is book-keeper and clerk of the insurance department; W. R. Smith, assisted by Jim Daly, has charge of the abstract department, which embraces a complete set of abstracts of title of every piece of real estate in the city and county.

At the rear of the business office is Mr.

Niederlander's private office, which has just been completed and furnished with a splendid mahogany desk with sliding lattice cover, elegant easy chairs and a revolving book case. The walls are covered with many handsome engravings illustrative of his business.

The whole constitutes the finest and most commodious office devoted to that business west of the Mississippi, and without exag-eration, it might be said that Niederlander business is the largest done by any establishment in the same line in the United States.
